

Think About Law School

Services for Legal Education From the Law School Admission Council

Thinking about law school? This booklet describes several services provided by the Law School Admission

Council, an organization founded to support legal education. These services, along with some helpful publications designed with you in mind, make learning about and applying to law school easy.

What is the Law School Admission Council?

The Law School Admission Council, Inc. (LSAC) is a nonprofit corporation whose members are more than 200 law schools in the United States, Canada, and Australia. Founded in 1947 to coordinate, facilitate, and enhance the law school admission process, the organization also provides programs and services related to legal education.

All law schools approved by the American Bar Association (ABA) are LSAC members. Fifteen Canadian law schools recognized by a provincial or territorial law society or government agency also are included in the voting membership of the Council.

The services provided by LSAC include the Law School Admission Test (LSAT); the Law School Data Assembly Service (LSDAS), including the LSAC Letter of Recommendation Service and LSDAS Electronic Applications; the Candidate Referral Service (CRS); and various test preparation publications and law school guides.

The LSAT, LSDAS, and CRS are provided, as explained in the following pages, to assist law schools in serving and evaluating applicants. LSAC does not engage in assessing an applicant's chances for admission to any law school; all admission decisions are made by individual law schools.

What is the LSAT?

The Law School Admission Test (LSAT) is a half-day, standardized test administered four times each year at designated testing centers throughout the world. Most law schools in the United States and Canada use LSAT results as part of their admission process. All LSAC-member schools require applicants to take the LSAT.

The LSAT is designed to measure skills considered essential for success in law school: the reading and comprehension of complex texts with accuracy and insight; the organization and management of information and the ability to draw reasonable inferences from it; the ability to think critically; and the analysis and evaluation of the reasoning and arguments of others.

The test consists of five 35-minute sections of multiple-choice questions. Four of the five sections contribute to the test taker's score. These sections include one reading comprehension section, one analytical reasoning section, and two logical reasoning sections. The unscored section, commonly referred to as the variable section, typically is used to pretest new test questions or to preequate new test forms. The placement of this section in the LSAT will vary for each administration of the test. The LSAT is scored on a scale of 120 to 180, with 180 being the highest possible score. A 35-minute writing sample is administered at the end of the test. LSAC does not score the writing sample, but copies are sent to all law schools to which a candidate applies.

What is the Law School Data Assembly Service?

The Law School Data Assembly Service (LSDAS) is a web-accessible clearinghouse for collecting and transmitting undergraduate transcripts, letters of recommendation, and law school applications. Nearly all ABA-approved law schools (and some non-ABA-approved law schools) in the United States require applicants to register for this service.

LSAC provides law schools with a report containing standardized summaries of academic work, copies of college transcripts, letters of recommendation, LSAT scores, and writing samples for each applicant. Rather than collect and provide transcripts, letters of recommendation, LSAT scores, and the like to several law schools, you provide all of the information required by each school to LSAC, and LSDAS takes care of the rest.

How can the Candidate Referral Service help me?

The Candidate Referral Service (CRS) makes information about law school candidates available to law schools. Through CRS, a law school can search for potential applicants on the basis of certain desired characteristics; for example, GPA, age, citizenship, race or ethnicity, interest in a specific program, geographic background, and LSAT score. By registering for CRS, applicants may be recruited by law schools that they may not have considered previously. This service is free at www.LSAC.org.

Why law school?

Consider this. To become a lawyer is to take part in shaping the life of a nation and its people. Lawyers are central figures in the life of a democratic country.

About 73 percent of American lawyers are in private practice, most in small, one-person offices, and some in large firms. Roughly 8 percent of the profession work for government agencies. About 10 percent work for private industries and associations as salaried lawyers or even as managers. About 1 percent work for legal aid or as public defenders, and 1 percent work in legal education. A law school education is a good, solid background for many professions. In fact, many teachers, businesspeople, and writers working today obtained a legal education before pursuing their respective careers.

What does a legal education cover?

Although you may choose from several different paths to a good legal education, whether the law school you choose is public or private, large or small, faith-based or independent, or affiliated with a university, you'll find that the basic curriculum focuses on certain legal skills required of all lawyers.

A legal education is designed to develop your analytical, creative, and logical reasoning abilities. Going to law school will also strengthen your reading and debating skills.

Lawyers must know how to analyze legal issues in light of the constantly changing state of the law and public policy. They must be able to advocate the views of individuals and diverse interest groups within the context of the legal system. They must be able to synthesize material that relates to multifaceted issues. They must give intelligent counsel on the law's requirements. Moreover, lawyers must write and speak clearly and be able to persuade and negotiate effectively.

Is there a standard law school curriculum?

Not exactly. But in nearly every state, graduation from an ABA-approved law school is required for admission to the bar. Each ABA-approved law school provides basic training in American law sufficient to qualify its graduates to take the bar examination in all states.

Most law schools require three years of full-time attendance, or four years of part-time study, if a part-time program is offered. Although law schools differ in the emphasis they give to certain subjects and in the degree to which they provide opportunities for independent study and clinical experience, nearly all law schools have certain basic similarities. Most law schools rely on the "case method" approach to teaching. First-year curricula usually include courses in civil procedure, constitutional law, contracts, criminal law and criminal procedure, legal method, legal writing and research, property law, and torts.

Most law schools share a common approach to the task of training lawyers. Many emphasize particular teaching methods, placing students in legal internships for academic credit, or using government or legal resources of a surrounding community. A number of schools have developed specialized programs of instruction combining law with other disciplines such as business, public administration, international relations, science, and technology.

How do I prepare for law school?

Law schools want students who can think critically and write well, and who have some understanding of the forces that have shaped the human experience. These attributes can be acquired in any number of college courses, whether in the arts and humanities, the social sciences, or the natural sciences.

An undergraduate career that is narrowly based or vocationally oriented may not be the best preparation for law school. As long as you receive an education including critical analysis, logical reasoning, and written and oral expression, the range of acceptable college majors is very broad. What counts is the intensity and depth of your undergraduate program and your capacity to perform well at an academically rigorous level.

Who is applying to law school?

For fall 2007, about 26 percent of all law school applicants were 22 years old or younger; about 38 percent were 23 to 25; and about 19 percent were between ages 26 and 29. Applicants who were 30 to 34 years old made up about 8 percent of the applicant pool, while 9 percent were over 34 years old.

A growing number of women began to apply to America's law schools beginning in the early 1970s, when only 10 percent of all law students were women. Currently, nearly one-half of all applicants are women.

For fall 2007, there were over 84,000 applicants of which almost 24,300 were minority applicants. The proportion of all applicants who identified themselves as being from a specific minority group has been relatively stable over the past 10 years at between 27 percent and 29 percent of the total applicant pool. And, the number of minority applicants has nearly tripled over the past 22 years.

How do I choose a law school?

You should begin the process of choosing a law school with an honest appraisal of your strengths and preferences. You should consider the size, composition, and background of the student body; the location, size, and nature of the surrounding community; the particular strengths or interests of the faculty; the degree to which clinical experience or classroom learning is emphasized; the nature of any special programs offered; the number and type of student organizations; the range of library holdings; and whether a school is public or private. You may wish to consider a school with a strong minority recruitment, retention, and mentoring program, or one with an active student organization for students of your particular ethnic background or special interest.

At any rate, you should actually select more than one law school where you think you could succeed. Today, the average applicant applies to six or more schools.

How can I find out more about law schools?

Look widely and inquire thoroughly. Select the law schools to which you will apply only after reviewing the admission material available from each law school on your list of possibilities.

Contact law schools for their bulletins, catalogs, or other materials that include complete and current information. A complete list with addresses and URLs for all LSAC-member schools in the US, Canada, and Australia is included below. For online links to the law schools, visit LSAC's website at www.LSAC.org.

Consult your college prelaw advisor. Undergraduate institutions with prelaw advisors or career counselors encourage students and alumni to contact them for assistance—even if you have been out of school for a number of years.

Visit law schools. You can learn a great deal by talking with students and faculty members, and by visiting classes. Talk to alumni of the schools, preferably a recent graduate or one who is active in alumni affairs.

Attend a free Law School Forum. Law School Forums are excellent opportunities to talk with law school representatives from around the country in one central urban location. Go to LSAC's website for dates and locations.

Law School Guides

ABA-LSAC Official Guide to ABA-Approved Law Schools™ (2009 Edition)

This is the only official guide to all the American Bar Association (ABA)-approved law schools in the United States, and it's the only one that contains up-to-date admission criteria and other essential admission information provided by the schools themselves. The Official Guide is the one book in which each school tells its story so that you can compare and decide which schools are best for you. Each school submits data required from the ABA for accreditation, and most schools include applicant profile grids reflecting their admission decisions for the previous year. Tuition and living expenses, grants and scholarships, curriculum, class size, employment and bar-passage rates, special programs, and facilities are only some of the many categories covered in this handy guide.
